① SEATTLE -- Less than three months after acquiring Internet pharmacy operator Soma.com, CVS Corp. has relaunched the web site under its own name, offering both prescription and nonprescription products to consumers who log on.

④ Consumers who place an order can opt to have the items shipped to their home or pick them up at any CVS store.

⑥ "The integration of CVS and cvs.com allows our customers to take control of their own shopping experience by determining when and how they access the stores," says Pigott, who established Soma.com in December 1997.

⑦ "It's a case of one plus one equals three Customers can access CVS day or night, speak with a pharmacist and place orders for prescriptions in a way that is convenient, confidential and price competitive."

⑧ As a part of its commitment to maintaining the efficacy of CVS' pharmacy operation, the company is stressing that consumers who place orders through the web site can speak to a pharmacist via a toll-free phone number at any time or correspond by E-mail. It has also vowed to protect patient confidentiality using the highest level of encryption available.

⑨ As was the case with Soma.com prior to the acquisition, cvs.com has a firm policy of filling only those prescriptions that have been written by an authorized health care provider.
